Kate Masterson, Well-Known Critic and Story Writer, Says the Playwright Feminine Characters Have Masculine Brains.

BY KATE MASTERSON.

New Tork, July 22.—Bernard Shaw is never so incomprehensible as when he nictures the women of his plays. One after another these brain children of his step out from the pages of his fascinating dramas, interesting and novel as types studies of character, problems intellectual monstresities, but far afield at all times from resility.

tellectual monstrosities, but far afield at all times from reality.

And yet he is a realist in all other matters. His men are human, often common-blace. But one would think that the Shaw women came from a brain specialist's tellection of charts, as specimens of abnormality. They belong in comic operarather than comedy. They are not womanly, but New Womanly, and in that hudable pastime, the pursuit of man, they betray methods and maneuvers that prove them distinctly the creations of a man who is striving to pertray an idea. ran who is striving to portray an idea ther than a woman.

He constructs his women as cleverly as a plays so far as structure is contract. He even pays attention to their other, but makes them consistently imclothes, but makes them consistently impossible as women, although vastly interesting as types. But through them all—the preachy Candida and the unusual Gloria, the gentlemanly Vivle and all the rest of the group—the whole Shaw cycle of girls, one traces the confession that the clever, charming Irishman, dazzling us and touching our hearts almost cruelly at times, does not give us a real womam but rather a poster girl, audacious in drawing and color, wearing her mentality like a tin surcole and affecting us with a certain affizikt.

Pike a tin surrole and affecting us with a certain affright.
Shakespeare, as well as Dickens, has been accused of giving his herolnes a colorless negative sort of graciousness at best Artificiality fairly screams from them, and we are forced to admit that a man's woman—even a master man's woman—is as faulty as the heroes that women novellets delight to draw, creatures of ciothes and epigram, or in the "sterling" characters self-conscious prigs, reliculous as the good little boys of the old-fashioned story books.

reliculous as the good little boys of the old-fashioned story books.

Bernard Shaw cannot be accused of idealising his women. None of them is illumined by a touch of religion, of real tenderness. They are masculine brains in woman bodies. The most real creature he has drawn is the terrible Mrs. Warren, but, terrible as she is, her daughter is a veritable intellectual monster compared with her.

is a veritable intellectual monster compared with her.

Shaw, therefore is not a poet, for a poet will insist on his ideals in women—he cannot seem to escape from them. But the realist would have his Lady Godiva ride through the town with her hair in a near Psyche knot on top of her head. He casts off all illusions and dissects the woman separated from the mysterious and wonderful thing we call sex.

Pinero, Heary Arthur Jones and Wilde have on the contrary oversexed their women characters. The woman swayed by her emotions in deflance of her reasoning powers must always be the type truest ling powers must always be the type truest to nature, although these playwights ren-der her revolting sometimes in their ac-cent on this theme.

RUNS TO OTHER EXTREME But Shaw runs daringly to the other atterne and makes his women into slot machines from which emerge views, theo-ries, rules of life and conduct, demands for truth and liberty of action, occasional outhorsts of neurotic passion everything all things but a love for chiffons and a penchant for tears rather than logical Shaw woman is always up-stage.

The Shaw woman is always up-stage, and could she be given life she would be the most unbearable of bores. Men, instead of loving her, would fee from her to listen gratefully to the prattle of some toe dancer or kittenish chorus maiden. Gloria, ensconced in a five-room flat would be like a leashed flying machine-in fact, the atmosphere of this particular play and a few others gives the sensation in reading that the action is taking place in a sandtarium, which would be even more admirable ground for a Shaw comedy than admirable ground for a Shaw comedy than of the Shaw women-those able young females who have been dicted on paper and link instead of caramels—seems to be that the writer uses them as symbolic personages rather than girls with girl attributes. He repeatedly seers at them and personally betrays the spirit of a Turk in his lines, carrying some of his characters from the severely mental to the severely animal and allowing no saving grace between. GRUDGE AGAINST THE SEX.

here are creatures of brain and body expurgated sex instincts. Even Canwho prates of her children or is it ausband's children that she calls would not hold a haby in her arms em?-would not hold a baby in her arms the any security of course, the Shaw women are interting for they show that, like many her clever men, the writer has a sort of udge against the sex. Unlike many hers though, he gives the painted adow of his disappointment form rather an creating an ideal out of his fancy. He is carbaturist more than writer. He lee'ts his theme and strives to illustrate hut he never bees sight of his idea, is people are only puppets who give vent his personal antiquathles. It's Shaw who haranguing all the while rather than the people in the play, and this is one agen why the women are such gentleanly creatures with hursts of boyish enmaliasen instead of blushes and blues.
This is characteristic of the writer. He unleds one of a unlege boy in ballet is characteristic of the writer, its cine of a college boy in ballet striving to be feminine by means y posings and gestures which he are girtist. So Shaw expounds his ylong through, women's lips, and the those human or hills. Candida.

The stage standard was divinely human because in spite of her wordy tendencies there mas the actress deen, gentle voice, her deliracy, her gown, her smiles, all beating at your brain the fact that she beating at your brain the fact that she was a woman. The Candida in the printed play is a cress between a beek agent and ger doctor who rould dissect a live cat and talk about the duration of its heart beats as other women would about the new sleeves. Sie was far shead of even liceve. She was far shead of even two rapid times, playwright positively displays sym-playwright positively displays sym-The playwright positively displays sympaths with Mrs. Warren and makes you sorry for a woman who could have such a ciri-a girl who leasts that she documt, gare for remance or beauty.

She says: "I like working and getting paid for it. When I am tired working I like a comfortable chair, a cigarette, a little whisky and a novel with a good detective story in it."

PAWBITTEN CHARMS

But it is what Shas has not aritten about women that is the charm. What is the ideal that he grants so zealously, never once admitting a hint of her to enter one of his play women? He loves beauty and hains starch and shoe blacking, but he will not embody beauty in feminine form: that is not purely external. Glaria is a beauty-but at soul a hareh young ogress. A dentist was too good for her. But who can dery that we were vastly thred of the spangled ladies of Pinero and the tailor-made griddens of Clivio Fitch The Shaw woman, sairs that she is, depends neither on growns nor on goo-goo morals. She belongs to a new school and ane acts immensely better than she reads. She has conquered New York, fed on seatests and Smith libratus.

And this, two, was Shaw's second coming, so to speak for in the Mansfieldian production require forgrid the lady on the horse in our neimination for the ring master. The time was rive for another prophet, for the quaint rustic bayseed was as played out as the real clample, and the problem play was only good for special matinees.

announce himself against Senator Jones. Clarke and Davis were at that time the bitterest of enemies. Yet Davis urged his followers to vote for Clarke and he brought about Senator Jones's defeat.

Senator Jones at that time was the biggest man politically in Arkansas. He was popular with all classes, and his rise to the chairmanship of the National Democratic Committee made him "a man above men" in the eyes of the Arkansas people. James P. Clarke was at that time far from being a bopular men with the "red necke and hill billies." but Jeff Davis made him so. He visited every county in the State and went right into the heart of Senator Jones's home and other strongholds, and election day demonstrated his remarkable success. Counties that had gone for Jones in previous elections without a dissenting vote went solid for Clarke, and at the same time gave Jeff Davis enough votes to elect him Governor for a third term by a majority of thousands.

Clearing way to senature to Jeff Davis than anything else he could have accomplished. He knew that. It was his farsighted political instinct that prompted him to decline to oppose Senator Jones himself, but to use Senator Clarke, whose home in the Eastern district of Arkansas was known to be solid for him, while Davis figured to carry all other sections of the State, then thought to be the impregnable strongholds of the distinguished representative who had so long represented Arkansas at the capitol. By defeating Jones, Davis cleared the way for his campaign against Berry. He demonstrated that the old Confederacy of Arkansas was not wholly in favor of perpetual administration on the part of one of its comrades. At the same time Davis catered to the younger element for his votes, to more easily defeat Carroll D. Wood of Hot Springs, a forger member of the Arkansas Supreme Court, who opposed him.

When Davis was elected Governor a third time in 18th, he repeated his first victory, sweeping the State. In his first gubernatorial campaign he carried seventy-four counties out of seventy-five, in his second seventy-one and in his third sixty. He is making the startling statement now that he will carry the total number of seventy-five in his race for the Senate.

In electing himself a third time, Governor Davis shattered a precedent, and it has enabled him to build up a machine which has become apparently almost invincible. No man in Arkansas has bitterer political and personal enemies than Governor Davis. He has been assaulted while making his campaigning tours, and on one occasion was knocked from a platform by his opponent. Judge Wood, during a heated argument. While his principal opposition in politics comes from political leaders, there are men in Arkansas, admirers of the "one-legged Benator," who have expressed themselves as preferring death rather than to see Davis succeed him.

death rather than to see Davis succeed him.

Davis's great strength comes from the common people. He opened his present campaign at Conway, Ark., July 4, on which day Senator Berry declined to meet him in joint debate. Senator Berry said it was too early; that the farmers, now in the midst of their crop making, should not be disturbed with the roar of political differences. Davis paid little or no attention to the Senator's argument. He appeared at Conway as announced, and before 10,000 people he reviewed Berry's record in war and in politics, and took occasion to present some of his own "doings" in the Statehouse and in other official capacities. Since that day he has appeared at various places over the State making speeches. making speeches.

In his campaign Davis goes directly to the people. He sways the masses with his strong and forceful style and has actually driven some of Arkansas's greatest craters from the stump.

In the bill of exceptions flied by Judge Shepard Barelay, attorney for the People's United States Bank and E. G. Lewis, in the County Court at Clayton to the report of Seiden P. Speneer, he stremuously objects to the claims made on the bank by the receiver.

The bill alleges that the condition under which Judge Speneer took charge of the bank was void of jurisdiction and repudiates all of the receiver's claims.

The bill also alleges that Judge Speneer has failed to comply with the order of the court, entered July 17, whereby he was directed to deliver forthwith to defendant all of the property and assets in his custody.

was directed to deliver forthwith to defendant all of the property and assets in his custody.

The bill says: "Judge Spencer has improperly retained and refused to deliver to defendant $2.100, referred to in his report, claiming to retain the same for the purpose of paying alleged expenses in the administration of said People's United States Bank in his possession; and defendant specifically and specially excepts to that feature of said report for the reason that the court was without infisition to make said order uniter which Judge Spencer took charge of the bank, and it is without infisdiction to charge such item or make said order uniter which Judge Spencer took charge of the bank, and it is without infisdiction to charge such item or make any allowance against the defendant."

The bill also objects to paying the $12-100 to Judge Spencer on the grounds that the amount asked was grossly in excess of the value of bits services. In the concluding paragraph, it objects to several bills said to have been paid out by Judge Spencer for reason that no concher, receipt or other evidence of payment is submitted by the receiver.
